The Psychology Of Team Building

Team building exercises serve to bring together colleagues, improve relations and generally facilitate a better working environment in the office. This can only benefit your company as a contented and motivated team will make excellent profits and sales. The types of activities chosen for corporate bonding events can vary greatly, from a simple socialising activity to a full-blown corporate team building day.

Organisational psychology encompasses team building. This is because it triggers a reaction in the brain that inspires a group to communicate through a series of fun and motivational events. It can affect the individual by improving their confidence as they realise new skills and interests. For example, team building tasks can demonstrate inherent leadership skills that were never recognised before as the individual is taken out of their comfort zone. This can result in greater job satisfaction as they are given new roles and goals.

Team building will also benefit the team as a whole. As people that have never worked together before are forced to communicate they can discover that they actually enjoy this interaction and continue to network and bond with different people back at the office. Those who previously did not see eye to eye will have to forget their differences to overcome a different team or obstacle and their dislike will be broken down as the work together for a common goal.

Most offices contain allegiances between certain groups of workmates and divisions are often clear between these groups. Team building helps break down these barriers by creating a forced interaction between the established groups. This creates a chance for networks and friendships to form. When the individuals realise that this brings about positive results and can actually be fun they will be more inclined to associate among different groups when back in the office.
